Central America and Zachary Taylor signing the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty prevented an immediate rush for influence in the region. The treaty, often referred to as the "Bulwer-Pact," was signed in 1850 and aimed to prevent any one nation from dominating the Central American isthmus by building a canal. Historians of the canal project often note that the treaty was a key factor in preventing a race to build a canal through Central America. The treaty stipulated that any canal built in the region would be controlled by both the United States and Great Britain. This arrangement was seen as a way to maintain a balance of power and prevent either nation from gaining too much influence in the area. The treaty also addressed the issue of the proposed canal route, which was a subject of debate between the United States and Great Britain. The United States favored a route through Nicaragua, while Great Britain favored a route through Central America. The treaty ultimately prevented the United States from building a canal through Nicaragua, which was a major disappointment for American officials. The treaty also prevented Great Britain from building a canal through Central America, which was a major disappointment for British officials. The treaty was a significant diplomatic achievement for both nations and helped to maintain peace in the region for several decades. The treaty also had a lasting impact on the development of Central America, as it prevented the United States and Great Britain from dominating the region. The treaty is still remembered today as a key event in the history of the canal project and the relationship between the United States and Great Britain.
